Alright, in my opinion, taking a job with a low salary that has a lot of vacation time can be a good option, but it depends on your life stage and priorities.

Firstly, if you're young and seeking new experiences, this free time allows for travel, volunteering, or pursuing hobbies. These experiences can be personally enriching and even build valuable skills.

Secondly, a good work-life balance can be crucial for preventing burnout and maintaining overall well-being. Ample vacation days let you recharge and return to work feeling refreshed.

However, financially supporting oneself can be challenging on a low salary. So, this option might not be suitable for everyone, especially those with families or significant financial obligations.

Overall, a low-paying job with generous time off can be an attractive choice for those prioritizing experiences and well-being, but careful financial planning is necessary.

Key point 3: Children can possibly become disorientated in life and career choices and decisions

Parents want to make lots of money to support their children

Parents think that making money can help families be happier

Modern families follow the western trend and they want their children to be independent

They bring their children to extra classes so they have time to work more

Because of lacking of love from parents children can drop out of school and participate in social evils.

Because their job requests are higher and higher, parents use most of their time on working.

More and more parents don't want to be dependent on their children so both parents try to work hard.

Children can become lonely.

They can break up easily because they don't have children

Key point 1: The couple can freely pursue personal interests and desire

Key point 2: The couple can lead a life without worrying about earning too much money to care for children

Key point 3: The couple cannot enjoy the happiness of a family life with children playing around or to teach good life lessons.

Key point 4: The couple can get lonely when they age and become too frail to look after themselves

In my opinion, those who choose not to have children the couple can do what they like without being restricted by the kids

The couple can travel freely together without worrying about anything

The couple can get enjoy the happiness of a family life with children playing around to teach good life lessons

The family will lose children's voice, smile and marriage life boring when the couple choose not to have children

When the couple choose not to have children their marriage can break down at anytime

I think when a couple with no children they can comfortable make money and when they get older they can travel together in the same place they like

The couple can adopt children to take care of instead of choose to give birth
